The causes of the Age of Sacred Terror are complex and varied, but they can be broadly grouped into three categories:

1. Political Factors: The Age of Sacred Terror often coincided with periods of political instability and upheaval. In these times, rulers and religious leaders often used religion as a tool to control the masses and maintain their power.
2. Economic Factors: Economic inequality and social unrest can also contribute to the rise of religious intolerance. When people are struggling to make ends meet, they may be more likely to turn to religion for comfort and guidance. This can lead to the development of extreme religious beliefs and practices, which can in turn fuel violence.

3. Cultural Factors: Cultural factors can also play a role in the development of religious intolerance. In some societies, there is a strong emphasis on religious conformity and orthodoxy. Individuals who deviate from the accepted norms may be seen as a threat to the community and may be subject to persecution.

The consequences of the Age of Sacred Terror are far-reaching and devastating. Religious persecution has led to the deaths of countless people throughout history, and it has also caused widespread social and psychological damage.

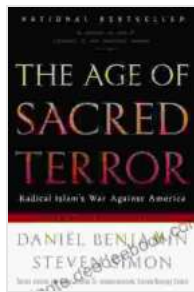

In addition to the direct violence, the Age of Sacred Terror has also had a number of indirect consequences:

1. The suppression of dissent: The Age of Sacred Terror has led to the suppression of dissent and intellectual freedom. People who question the established religious beliefs are often met with hostility and violence.
2. The rise of extremism: The Age of Sacred Terror has also led to the rise of religious extremism. When people are persecuted for their beliefs, they may become more radical in their views and more willing to use violence to defend them.
3. Long-term social unrest: Religious persecution can also lead to long-term social unrest and conflict. When people are treated unjustly because of their religious beliefs, they may become alienated from society and more likely to engage in violence.

The Age of Sacred Terror is a dark period in human history. It is a time of violence, persecution, and intolerance. We must learn from the mistakes of the past and work to prevent such atrocities from happening again.
