The Impact of the Pandemic

The COVID-19 pandemic has cast an unprecedented shadow over humanity, leaving a trail of abandoned businesses, empty streets, and desolate public spaces. Edmiston's "What Remains" series is a poignant reflection on the pandemic's impact, capturing the eerie stillness and solitude that permeated our world during that time.

The images in "What Remains" evoke a sense of longing and loss, as if these abandoned places were once vibrant and bustling hubs of activity. Now, they stand silent and forlorn, bearing witness to the fragility of our social and economic structures.

Captivating Portrayal of Urban Decay

Edmiston's masterful use of light and composition transforms these decaying structures into captivating works of art. He captures the intricate details of peeling paint, crumbling walls, and overgrown vegetation, revealing the beauty hidden within decay.

Through his lens, these abandoned places become symbols of time's relentless march and the transience of material possessions. They invite viewers to contemplate the cyclical nature of life and the inevitable decay that awaits us all.

Exploring the Narratives of the Past

Beyond their aesthetic appeal, Edmiston's photographs also tell compelling stories about the people who once inhabited these spaces. Each abandoned building holds a secret history, waiting to be uncovered.

By exploring the remnants of the past, Edmiston invites us to imagine the lives that unfolded within these walls. He challenges us to consider the dreams, ambitions, and struggles of those who have come before us.

Forgotten Spaces, Lost Memories

"What Remains" is a testament to the power of abandonment to evoke both fear and fascination. Edmiston's images capture the forgotten corners of our world, places that have been left behind by the relentless march of time.

In these forgotten spaces, we find remnants of a bygone era. Old photographs, faded letters, and discarded toys offer tantalizing glimpses into the lives of those who once called these places home.

Rodford Edmiston's "What Remains" is a haunting and evocative exploration of abandonment and decay. Through his masterful photography, he invites us to contemplate the impermanence of human existence and the stories hidden within forgotten places.

As we navigate an uncertain future, Edmiston's images serve as a reminder of the fragility of our world and the importance of cherishing the moments we have.
