- Atlantic City: This town was founded in 1868 as a gold mining camp. At its peak, Atlantic City had a population of over 5,000 people. However, the gold rush eventually ended, and the town was abandoned in 1890. Today, Atlantic City is a ghost town, and it is home to a number of abandoned buildings, including a hotel, a bank, and a schoolhouse.
- Lander: This town was founded in 1870 as a gold mining camp. At its peak, Lander had a population of over 3,000 people. However, the gold rush eventually ended, and the town was abandoned in 1890. Today, Lander is a ghost town, and it is home to a number of abandoned buildings, including a hotel, a bank, and a schoolhouse.

These are just a few of the many ghost towns that can be found in Wyoming. Each town has its own unique story, and they all offer a glimpse into the past. If you are ever in Wyoming, be sure to visit one of these ghost towns and learn about the history of the state.

Hauntings

Many of Wyoming's ghost towns are said to be haunted by the spirits of those who died there. These spirits are often said to be restless and unable to move on to the afterlife. Some of the most common types of hauntings that are reported in Wyoming's ghost towns include:

- Sightings of ghosts: Many people have reported seeing ghosts in Wyoming's ghost towns. These ghosts are often said to be transparent or misty, and they may be wearing clothing from the time period in which they died.
- Sounds of footsteps: Many people have reported hearing footsteps in Wyoming's ghost towns, even when there is no one else around. These footsteps are often said to be heavy and slow, and they may be accompanied by the sound of moaning or crying.
- Objects moving on their own: Many people have reported seeing objects move on their own in Wyoming's ghost towns. These objects may include doors opening and closing, windows breaking, and furniture moving.

There are many different theories about why Wyoming's ghost towns are said to be haunted. Some people believe that the spirits of those who died there are unable to move on to the afterlife because they have unfinished business. Others believe that the spirits are trapped in the towns because of the negative energy that was created there during the gold rush era. Whatever the reason, the hauntings of Wyoming's ghost towns are a reminder of the state's rich and often tragic history.

Treasure Tales

In addition to being haunted, many of Wyoming's ghost towns are also said to be hiding lost treasures. These treasures are often said to have been buried by prospectors during the gold rush era. Some of the most famous treasure tales in Wyoming include:

- The Lost Dutchman Mine: This mine is said to be located in the Superstition Mountains of Arizona. According to legend, the mine was discovered by a German immigrant named Jacob Waltz in the 1840s. Waltz is said to have hidden the mine before he died, and its location has been a mystery ever since.
- The Lost Treasure of the Black Hills: This treasure is said to be hidden in the Black Hills of South Dakota. According to legend, the treasure was buried by a group of outlaws in the 1870s. The location of the treasure has been a mystery ever since.
- The Lost Treasure of the Wyoming Badlands: This treasure is said to be hidden in the Wyoming Badlands. According to legend, the treasure was buried by a group of prospectors in the 1880s. The location of the treasure has been a mystery ever since.

There is no evidence to support any of these treasure tales, but they continue to fascinate people to this day. The lure of lost treasure is a powerful one, and it has led many people to search for these hidden riches. However, no one has ever been able to find any of these treasures, and it is likely that they will remain lost forever.
